The purpose of participating in this society is to listen to presentations specialized for conservation of all species not limited by primates, to acquire knowledge about conservation research by sociological method, to have a poster presentation there. This academic society in this time was mainly research in Asia, but as there were many research presentations based on fieldwork studies, I could find research that could be helpful. There were two core times of poster presentation during the exhibition, but there were quite a lot of people stopping their feet in front of my posters, and many people asked me questions. For Bonobo researchers in Congo, even though it is not a brand new fact, as researchers with different regions and target species may be regarded as shocking survey results, they seem to have a greater response than my imagination. Looking at researches on conservation in recent years in papers and presentations, it seems that there are many interdisciplinary researches. There are things that make one research result with both animal ecology and sociology, but I felt that social science + anthropological methods similar to my research are not so much yet . This time for the first time I participated in an academic society that specialized in conservation, but I listened a lot of research and it was a good opportunity for me to have presentation my own research.
